CHICAGO – Families dealing with the effects of aging parents – which include dementia and Alzheimer's Disease – can experience a new film which explores these topics through the family dynamic. "What They Had" is writer/director Elizabeth Chomko's debut, and features Robert Forster, Blythe Danner, Hilary Swank and Michael Shannon.

Forster and Danner portray an elder couple from Chicago, who are being pressured by their children (Michael Shannon and Hilary Swank) to provide dementia care for Danner's character, who is mentally slipping away. Taut and emotional, it features fine performances from all the principal players, including Forster as a man of his generation who isn't used to ultimately not taking care of his castle and family. The film recently had a Red Carpet screening at the 54th Chicago International Film Festival (CIFF), and is currently in release nationwide.

Robert Forster is an iconic character actor, who has worked steadily since first appearing in the film "Reflections in a Golden Eye" in 1967. His most famous film roles include "Medium Cool" (1968, also filmed in Chicago), "The Black Hole" (1979), "Jackie Brown" (1997), "Mulholland Drive" (2001), "The Descendants" (2011) and a memorable cameo in this year's anti-Western "Damsel"... besides hundreds of TV roles, including the recent Showtime revival of "Twin Peaks." The writer/director of "What They Had," Elizabeth Chomko, had primarily worked as an actor in television, and makes her filmmaker debut.
